I'm able to make the point feature collections accessible over the web, so I know where the data is. There are a lot of features in my datasets so I would like to expose the relationships between them as well. Is there a way to do this? A: One way of doing this is to serialize and deserialize the object and have REST service accept it and interact with it, with your data available at rest. The size of the feature collection is something that you would have to decide if you want to be available at rest. The problem with this is that it makes the data not really available for operations like querying. If you are looking to interact with a feature collection so that it exposes a 'graph' structure with node relationships, etc, you are going to have to do some work to get that structure. Q: Rails SQL: "Create SQL" My users have a "username" and "password" field. Sometimes I need to delete a user and need to write a SQL query to do it. In non-activerecord mode, I just write SQL query like this: SQL = "delete from some_table where username = 'myusername' and password='mypassword'" now, in an activerecord model, I create an action to delete the record. In that action, how to dynamically create a SQL query from the "username" and "password" params? A: I found a solution by myself. I create a model method called delete_association(association_name, auth_username, auth_password) that will look at User's profile params, and then it will try to create a SQL query using an association_name. It sounds complex, because we need to understand associations which I'm not familiar with. If you know a simpler way to do this, please answer me. So, just use the model method like this: User.find_by_username(username).delete_association(:coupons) Novartis is among the world's leading drugmakers.
